In today's hospitals, robots help doctors and nurses in many ways. Some robots bring food and medicine to patients. Others clean the hospital floors and rooms. These robots can move around using wheels and sensors, so they don't bump into things. In some places, robots help during surgery.

A doctor controls the robot to do careful movements that help people get better faster. Some robots are small and can even go inside the body to take pictures. Nurses and doctors like using robots because they save time and help them take care of more people. In the future, hospitals may use talking robots to help patients feel less lonely.

Robots in hospitals help with many important tasks, such as checking patients' vital signs and reminding them to take their medicine. They also store and organize medical supplies so nurses can find what they need quickly. Some robots guide visitors around the hospital, helping them reach the correct rooms and departments easily.

3. Read the following text, then answer the questions: (6 Marks)

Many children like to watch videos or play games on screens. Technology can be fun and educational, but too much screen time can make kids feel distracted, tired, and less active. Parents say children must have limits on how long they use screens each day. Children should also spend time outside playing sports, exploring nature, and talking with friends. Using screens at night can make it hard to sleep well, affecting health and mood. Smart users of technology change settings on their devices to reduce brightness, limit screen time, and take breaks often. Schools and parents can help children learn smart habits to control screen time. Developing these habits is important because Egypt's future depends on children growing up healthy, focused, and responsible. Learning to balance screen use with outdoor activities helps children improve both their mental and physical well-being while enjoying technology safely.

Salma was always scared of deep water. Every summer, her friends would go swimming, but Salma would sit quietly by the pool and watch them splash, laugh, and play. She wished she could join them, but her fear always stopped her. One day, her mom signed her up for swimming lessons and said gently, "Just try. You might surprise yourself." At first, Salma didn't want to go, but she finally agreed because she wanted to become braver.

On the first day of lessons, Salma only dipped her feet in the cool water. The next week, she learned how to float with the instructor's help. Each lesson made her a little more confident. She practiced breathing, kicking, and moving her arms slowly but steadily. By not giving up and trying her best every time, she finally reached her goal. By the end of the month, she could swim across the entire pool. Her friends cheered loudly for her, and Salma couldn't wait for their next swimming trip.

AI serves as the "brain" inside a robot, enabling it to make decisions, learn from actions, and dynamically change its behavior. For instance, a robot vacuum cleaner equipped with AI can learn the precise shape of a room to improve its cleaning efficiency over time. Without AI, the robot is restricted to following only basic, pre-set orders.

Robots powered by AI are used in many environments. In hospitals, they assist by delivering medicine or helping during surgery. In schools, they help students practice new languages or solve complex math problems.

Despite these advancements, robots and AI face limitations. They cannot truly understand human emotions and frequently require human assistance for programming and operation. Additionally, the development and production of smart, capable robots can be significantly expensive.

AI in robots allows them to perform tasks too dangerous for humans, like exploring dangerous areas or handling heavy machinery. As AI advances, robots will take on more roles in industries like manufacturing and space exploration. However, concerns about job loss and privacy still need to be addressed.

Hey friends, welcome back! Today we're talking about smart cities and smart habits. Egypt is making great strides with amazing projects like the New Administrative Capital, the Monorail, and the Green River. These projects are built using cutting-edge technology and innovative ideas. However, big projects require smart citizens—people who are focused, healthy, and use technology wisely.

If we spend too much time scrolling through our phones or gaming, we lose energy and focus. That's why managing screen time is essential. Young people like us will become the future engineers, designers, and leaders of Egypt. By developing strong habits now—such as turning off distractions and using technology for learning—we can prepare ourselves to build a better future for the country.
